"You can't have things in a folder named 'Personal Items' and 'Your Personal Items': the folders you got will overwrite the contents." "I understand that when one user enters personal information into Dropbox, the other user must enter their names." "You can specify the name and unique account of anyone you create on that page." "Some people can give to a bank or company and still forget their PIN number, because this data is on file here and you'll have to open that account." "You can have things deleted. You have to delete the email or calendar, the email list that your Google account comes up with, anything that was placed there, anything that happened or is in there and be able to move it to the bank account without losing any sensitive information." "If the emails that you're sending to an email address are also sent to the Gmail account or your online contacts at another company." In the last few weeks I've seen several companies offer to send their customers a "personal backup key" that, once created in Google Docs and then copied with Office 365, will enable any number of Google Account users to create Google Cloud Drive from their own online database data. However, this policy was not applied in practice—I haven't seen Microsoft offer more detail given that the policy seems to be a bit opaque for companies that offer these options. Even before the rollout of Google Docs, it has been suggested that Microsoft could use the policy to set more stringent restrictions against the removal of personal information for purposes on the Cloud Drive itself. However, the Google Docs team suggests that this might be moot because there seems to be no evidence to suggest this is the case. I'm still waiting for more data. We'll know more about this after our Google Docs review. In addition, there may be a lot more data out there when it comes time to decide how to store personal information. As we continue to research Google's Privacy Policy, I'll have more information about all of this to share with you. Update: This article was first published on 4 Apr 2017 at 11.16PM UPDATE: In a post shared by The Guardian, a Microsoft official says "Microsoft will now consider 'personal backups for customers with sensitive personal information' to allow Google the ability to keep any and all of its Cloud Drive files on the cloud," referring to the Google Docs account. So in addition to Dropbox allowing you to keep your Google Apps' files on your cloud (no need for Microsoft to create a separate system called 'Personal Documents') Google will now be able to "preserve or restore other personal information, including your computer account, your Personal Information including your Gmail account" and send you a message on Gmail that explains how the file was destroyed. It's as though in theory Google would lose your Google Apps' data with no chance at all in case Microsoft has to make use of this policy, yet Microsoft claims to be aware of this privacy-related policy and has even suggested its approach may not be applicable to this post. In this, it appears Microsoft only claims to provide guidance on this option, rather than offer an assurance. Microsoft has also added an intriguing and interesting detail on this (to you, by the way) option. Microsoft did mention a particular document that was saved on the Cloud Drive last night: microsoft.org/en-us/docs/personalcomp.txt?docid=1750, as reported by Xt. How does this work? Google will have a "saved and renamed folders on Cloud Drive" backup program to do this. As was previously mentioned, Google Cloud Drive only records personal information about other users if they have access to one of the following Microsoft accounts(or any third-party Google-owned business accounts) that you might get through your Google Drive: â€¢ Microsoft Business accounts â€¢ Google Business accounts; and â€¢ Google Accounts on which Cloud Drive records private documents ("Personal Documents"). On these three Gmail accounts, you'd run your personal items from the Gmail "cloud" folder so you don't have a "personal backups" account that you have set for Cloud Drive: cloud.google.com. Microsoft also provides an extra Gmail account which means you would simply go to the Personal Documents folder on your Google Drive (to delete the folders). In this case, you'd have to open a separate Gmail account to sync documents between your Google Drive accounts: mailaddress. Google will, of course, have to create a separate Gmail account for each page of "Cloud Drives", and make it available to any Microsoft account you want (if you want one). The Gmail's Google Docs accounts on Cloud Drive hold a lot of personal-item notes such as a lot of photos, e-mails, texts, calendar plans, social media posts, and photos and other information about your friends, spouses and partners. This makes Microsoft seem to be using this document properties and personal information. Any breach could result in your account missing. document properties and personal information? No â€" The domain name database does not protect users from phishing scams, and our community is here to support you through technical assistance to ensure that we can provide you with your information to protect customers and their businesses. This is not so with Microsoft Word but simply to safeguard your information by having the data held up to strict security protocols in place in case problems arise. Q: When we issue an email, how is I registered, assigned and/or how long do I have to wait? When an email expires automatically. The time you have on record allows you to make your initial registration and reassign your email. You will only have those emails which you have registered by that time. To renew registration and update the email, your name must be printed and then added next to the email. Thats why, once the email has been sent with your name in accordance with those restrictions, you can use it to add it to your registered name. If you did this for any reason, you may have to wait 3 to 5 years. We work on a process to provide you with your new name as soon as possible. Do not attempt to cancel this process without your email confirmation. Your new name will expire after 8-17 weeks. Q: Does my email address match my contact info? Why do I have to enter my own information to sign up for this service? Because Microsoft Office 2016 does not share the full names of users associated with your organization on their contact list or in their mobile browser, but does the following in order of preference: Your Office Account name is not used to signup for this service, we want our users to understand that information so you can identify it properly and use it appropriately. Your name may be used to promote services of the Organization, please select on your profile what it is designed to accomplish. You are being invited into the Organization for your email addresses. By selecting "Register Now", you agree that you will enter these details into the email, including an appropriate telephone number and email address. A copy of your email will be kept for your personal personal, and that cannot be published in the future because I am the only person who can ensure the email works smoothly and securely on the Website or the contact list. You agree that when you email us you will use a form available provided. You have some choice at who to contact for this email. By submitting this email for use by you in the name of each person, you agree to this decision within 30 minutes and you may be able to send or otherwise accept this email. Do not exceed the limits of your personal contact information. If your name is associated with a particular service or activity other than Office Services, the contact information you choose to share is subject to change, except that you agree not to access the names, aliases, photos, contact information, and other private information of another organization's users. The domain name database doesn't protect users from fraud, spam nor unsolicited advertisements by anyone or themselves unless, under specified exceptions, you accept such exceptions and agree. Q: Where I receive emails about Windows Mobile, my name or email address, do you have a list of authorized email addresses that match your information please email me at bg@microsoft.com document properties and personal information? For individuals who can help and you in this matter, please see the Legal Aid Guidelines for each specific aspect of these purposes. Do I have control of the privacy of all personal information held securely with Microsoft? Yes. Microsoft collects personal information collected by Service Providers on both your and Windows' storage media, such e-bills and personal data about you, to help ensure that you have access to information you hold as part of your personal data. To obtain information that we need for our Services, you and your spouse must hold, or receive, your personal information through Microsoft Account and Windows Software. You may only provide or store personal information collected from the Services for such purposes with third parties or you consent not to provide your personal information to third parties. In such case, Microsoft does not store any personal information about people other than you if you include the information in the Services you share with at you-are-friends profile. All personal identifying information (e.g., name, address, and telephone number) that is shared with and submitted to or downloaded from Microsoft Services as part of our Customer Support Program can be turned over to Microsoft at a later date (as stated below). If you provide information that is deemed deemed "relevant" by customers, Microsoft will send a copy of these email messages to our Office, Office 365 Office Services database. You can follow the process to request permission to copy personal information and access our Services. What does Microsoft mean when it says this information is not to share with people and its not to store your password in Microsoft Services? It means how Microsoft makes sure everyone is protected by those rights, whether in privacy or security. Microsoft must ensure, that any personal information from your PC or mobile computer is stored as securely as possible (rather than through a third party's software or services). When you choose to opt out of Microsoft's use of privacy controls, this also means that you continue making decisions on use of the Services and do not need to remember password in particular settings to use the Services and Microsoft Services when setting up third-party services. Will Microsoft continue to share customer data or personal information collected through our Service for other services. If your partner does disclose your online location or billing history to a third party, this information from your partner may be disclosed to us or stored in Microsoft Data Services. You may obtain a copy of these confidential data privacy agreements and Microsoft shall use those agreements only after you have informed Microsoft that you intend to remain entirely informed about the use and value of the collection, use and and disclosure or the disclosure of such information. When Microsoft discloses personal information in the Microsoft Account of some or all of its customers, it must provide to our customers for their consent, by name, name, or company of business (e.g., a business to which you belong). For these customer uses, Microsoft may share personal information with third parties and provide a collection policy and security assurance program or the use of third-party products. Where would Microsoft have access access to my business records if I were a user on a service within a Service that has not yet been disclosed to me by Microsoft, such as Internet Explorer? Many types of Service (i.e., a user to whom is sent information, for example a website, app to which information is being sent); however, Microsoft has the obligation to give to its Customers the required consent on an individualized basis, particularly on individual or business needs. This may include, among other aspects such as: an express and specific consent to include the personal information in an account that the Online Account Manager or Service Manager is providing with; which Microsoft provides as part of Internet Explorer (
